Other's Eyes – Shopping

Buying clothes with your mom. Most women love clothing shops, but from the eye of a five-year-old it's just frightening getting lost in all those clothes. >

A contrast to the well-being feeling of the mother.

Other's Eyes – Shopping

The amazing world of buying food. Everything looks delicious, everything looks like you want to touch it. Especially in this picture, a 5 year-old can completely immerse in the feeling of being in a jungle or on a safari.

A place of well-being for the mother and the child.

(Galeria Kaufhof, Marienplatz, 5.7.2014)

Other's Eyes – Shopping

When dreams come true. The toys department. Never-ending shelves of board games. But wait - the toy to try out is still too high and you can't touch it! Unfair! Still, not a place you'd ever want to leave ...

(Galeria Kaufhof, Marienplatz, 5.7.2014)

Other's Eyes – Public Places

While it would generally be assumed that adults are able to look over parked cars, it is clear children can not – their view as pedestrians is obstructed, limited the sidewalk.

Obviously, this is generally regarded as a serious issue of safety.
(Ainmillerstraße, Schwabing, 6.7.2014)

Other's Eyes – Public Places

Low height means different strategies to experiencing the city and its sights.

Since the railing of this bridge is solid, and can generally be regarded as too high for children, an option would be trying to peak down the stream from the side.

Other's Eyes – Public Places

With the sun shining from above, and the child standing below in the dark, while this park sign is kept in a children-friendly language („the big bird-ABC“) apparently the difference in height wasn't fully considered; or no better solution was found. (Englischer Garten, Schwabing, 6.7.2014)

Other's Eyes – Public Transportation

People sitting and kissing, standing and talking and coming back from school.
(Tram 23, Schwabing Nord, 4.7.2014)

Other's Eyes – Public Transportation

People trying not to look at each other.
(Me as photographer as special “event”
to watch.)

Other's Eyes – Public Transportation

Trying to look out of the window.
